week, some psychiatrists in the United States and other countries saw patients in prisons, or secluded in their offices to avoid interruptions from the rest of the staff. A few psychiatrists were denied access to facilities for people with mental illness or problems. Most widely known of these was Dr. Richard Patterson, a former president of the American Psychiatric Association who ran a clinic in Springfield, Mo. that was free to patients, and was very well known for being able to see patients who would not have been able to access mental health care in other ways. A federal judge ordered the center closed on the grounds that Patterson was providing care without a license, but a new center has been constructed and the clinic reopened. Patterson says that he has not seen any patients in two years, and that he believes his license has been reinstated. To avoid state licensing laws, the United States prison system had traditionally relied on private contracting firms to run facilities for the mentally ill. Physicians who practice independently from those firms, such as Dr. Patterson, can spend more time treating their patients and better meet their needs. But such physicians are subject to the whims of the prisons, which are now increasingly under state oversight and regulation. “As a result of the business contract with the state, we had very little say in what happened in our facility,” Ms. Jody said. “I would never in a million years know anything about the interactions that our physicians had with the other people in the prison.” Like many of the inmates in the federal prison in eastern Pennsylvania, Ms. Jody has struggled with mental illness for years. In an interview, she spoke of spending hours each day in a solitary confinement cell that was so small she could not leave the toilet or sink without bending double. And she said she witnessed numerous inmate deaths, including one that she considers criminal. She recalled a man who began to eat large amounts of food and ate so much that he died.

“That was back in '08, and I asked the person who found him if they did CPR on him,” she said. “They said they did. I think the people in the medical center had to know that somebody would die. They had to plan around that. They shouldn't have left him
