A neuroimaging study of relaxation states: patients' descriptions of changes to regional cerebral blood flow and metabolism during dynamic meditation. Background Relaxation states such as mindfulness meditation have been shown to produce changes in regional cerebral blood flow and metabolism. However, little is known about how these changes relate to the subjective experience of the meditator. We used the Breath Awareness with Concentration (BAC) and the Breath Awareness without Concentration (BAWC) meditation practices to examine the experience of the meditator during the practice of mindfulness meditation. Methods We compared regional cerebral blood flow and metabolism between patients performing BAWC and controls performing BAC meditation using single-photon emission computed tomography and positron emission tomography. Relationships were examined between the regional cerebral blood flow and metabolism in resting subjects and in subjects performing the BAC and BAWC meditation. Results In meditators, increases in regional cerebral blood flow were localized to the primary visual, motor, and cingulate cortices. Statistically significant decreases in regional cerebral blood flow were observed in the pregenual anterior cingulate cortex, dorsomedial prefrontal cortex, left orbitofrontal cortex, anterior insula, and thalamus. In contrast to the BAC meditators, the BAWC meditators reported no changes in any regions of their brain. Regional cerebral blood flow decreased in all regions during the resting state in both groups. Increased thalamic metabolism in the BAWC meditators was associated with increased resting regional cerebral blood flow. Conclusion These findings in the BAC meditator suggest that the subjective experience of the BAC meditator is the product of neural adaptations that reduce the physiological arousal induced by meditation and increase the focus and attention directed toward the meditative experience. The data also suggest that the patient meditator may not be able to "turn off" the heightened arousal-related networks associated with higher states of mind which are a part of the default mode.
